ABSTRACT

This article examines the notions of productivity and creativity with respect to complex verbs in English. Verb-forming suffixation involves the attachment of the suffixes -ize, -ify, -en and -ate to a base to form complex verbs such as hospitalize, densify, sharpen and hyphenate. Sampson (2016) describes productive processes that conform to existing patterns as F-creativity, or Fixed-creativity, and those that deviate from those patterns as E-creativity, or Enlarging/Extending creativity; Bergs (2018) and Uhrig (2018) view the F–E dichotomy as a cline. Coercion effects can account for linguistic productivity and creativity; Audring & Booij (2016) propose that the coercive mechanisms of Selection, Enrichment and Override lie on a unified continuum. This article integrates the F–E creativity and coercion continua, and analyses a database of conventionalized and recently coined complex verbs (Laws 2023) for instances of coercion. The results reveal that coercive mechanisms, particularly Selection and Enrichment, facilitate productivity and creativity in more complex constructional schemas underlying verbal derivatives, and that these coercive patterns have become increasingly more entrenched over time. E-creativity of complex verbs is defined here as ‘Unruly’ coercion and the nature of attested examples is discussed.

Keywords: Construction Grammar; verb-forming suffixation; productivity; creativity; coercion

1. Introduction

There has been considerable debate over the last twenty years or so regarding the definition of linguistic creativity in terms of predictable productive processes, based on established linguistic patterns, and truly novel processes that emerge from unprecedented conceptualizations of form–meaning schemas. This article evaluates these phenomena in relation to complex verbs by analysing the nature and function of coercion in the interpretation of conventionalized and recently coined verbal derivatives from a constructional perspective.

By way of background, section 2.1 provides an overview of a constructional approach to verb-forming suffixation in English, proposed by Laws (2023), which forms the basis for the new analysis reported here. Section 2.2 evaluates current definitions of productivity and creativity, and examines the relationship between them. Section 2.3 focuses on coercive mechanisms that affect productivity and creativity, and formulates a model that integrates
