

Cognition and Sentence Production: A Cross-Linguistic Study

Review by: Morton Ann Gernsbacher

Book by: S. N. Sridhar

Spoken language epitomizes human creativity. Speaking requires formulating messages based on the ideas we want to express and the communicative goals we want to achieve. We formulate a message by choosing a grammatical structure, inserting words into that grammatical skeleton, inflecting the words, and then producing the sounds.

Most psycholinguistic research on sentence production focuses on the processes that occur later in this sequence. For instance, most research deals with how words are chosen, inserted, inflected, and produced (Garrett, 1988).

The questions of how speakers formulate messages and how they choose grammatical structure are not as thoroughly studied; consequently, they are not nearly as well understood. Perhaps it is not surprising that the most creative aspect of sentence production is also the most elusive. But the questions remain: How is a grammatical structure chosen? How does that structure reflect our ideas and communicative intent?

Sridhar's study addresses these questions using an experimental approach: He manipulates visual arrays, asks subjects to describe those visual arrays, and measures how his manipulations affect his subjects' choice of grammatical structure.

Cognition and Sentence Production: A Cross-Linguistic Study is a revised and enlarged version of Sridhar's doctoral dissertation. Although Sridhar is a linguist, he began his work while studying with Charles Osgood, and his work reflects Osgood's influence. For instance, Sridhar is reformulating Osgood's (1986) "Naturalness Principle" when he writes: "Many of the properties crucial to the structure and function of language . . . reflect universal properties of human perception and cognition and the function of language as a system of communication" (p. 7). Thus, Sridhar, like Osgood, adopts a functional approach. He argues that nonlinguistic cognitive processes and communicative intent are reflected in grammatical structure.

The study

Sridhar investigates how nonlinguistic cognitive processes and communicative intent are reflected in grammatical structure by exploring how "universal properties" of perception and cognition affect sentence production. To do this, Sridhar presented a film to native speakers of 10 diverse languages: Cantonese, American English, Finnish, Modern Israeli Hebrew, Hungarian, Slovenian, Mexican Spanish, Japanese, Turkish, and Kannada. Each scene in the film presented a visual array. Sridhar manipulated different aspects of the arrays. For example, he manipulated the perceptual salience of the different objects in the visual array by varying their size, shape, and orientation.

The subjects' task was to describe each scene with a single written sentence. Sridhar examined how his manipulations (e.g., perceptual salience) affected the grammatical structures his subjects produced. For instance, he measured his subjects' choice of word order and clause order, their use of active versus passive sentences, and their choice of sentence topic.

Sridhar's study makes several valuable contributions. First, it adds to the sparse cross-linguistic psychological research on sentence production. Second, it resolves some of the more vexing methodological problems inherent in sentence production research. Production research requires carefully controlling the input that elicits the subjects' productions and carefully measuring the output that subjects produce. The scenes in Sridhar's film were designed to be as cross-culturally neutral as possible. Each was created with an acute sense of the grammatical structures that would be comparable cross-linguistically and likely to be elicited. Sridhar's study joins Charles (1988) discourse production research in demonstrating that comparative cross-linguistic production research is possible.

Finally, Sridhar's study is important because his experimental psycholinguistic data corroborate naturalistic, descriptive data from cross-linguistic studies of discourse (Givón, 1979; Tomlin, 1988). Indeed, his success at eliciting experimental data encourages further collaboration between psychologists and linguists in cross-linguistic contexts.

Functional principles

As we mentioned above, functional grammarians argue that grammatical structure (syntax) reflects the way we perceive, organize, and communicate information. Functional approaches contrast with the generative tradition of Chomsky (1957) and others, who view syntax as an autonomous component structured according to the principles of the "language faculty" (Fodor, 1985). Although Sridhar does not directly address the differences between functional and generative theories, he does spend more than half the book surveying issues in functional grammar. In particular, he identifies the functional principles that motivate his study's hypotheses.

Sridhar classifies the functional principles into three categories: perceptual,
