

Translations and Transpositions

I suppose that the broadest distinction can draw between ways of transferring literary matter from one language to another is the distinction between translations and verse. And the broadest account of these distinctions is that where a writer purposes to take care of the letter of the original, a translation must attend to its spirit; that that is, broad indeed, an Admirabile factum of a distinction, and for the purposes of this paper I intend to carry a subtle line between translations and verse. The term I propose is "transposition". Transposition, in the sense I choose to give it, means when the language of the source is so translated as to be almost alike though not the language of the translator—in age, idiom, cultural habits and so on—but that he able to follow the letter with a fair degree of keeping faith with the spirit. Translating a modern French novel into English is thus mainly a matter of transposition. Poetry is more difficult, because its verbal organization is usually more concentrated and more personal; nevertheless a good deal of modern verse can usually be transposed. Take the English version of the poems of Claudy by Professor Marston Graham. It is, in a perfectly honestable sense, essentially a free rendering; yet as an account of the source (and source) of Claudy it is very serviceable and will stand with some as accurate as normal—and of course permitted by the laws of copyright—in advance a genetic reconstruction; yet, in other words, a translation. A somewhat more ambitious example of transposition is the version of Milton's Divine Rapture by Leitchman and Spenser. It reads like poetry, and as such, it seems to reproduce something of the spirit of Milton's poem, and yet it is close enough to the letter of the original to help the reader with some of the Admirabile factum of Milton's Divine Rapture.

The further one moves back in time, the more transposition must approximate to translation. There is nevertheless a definite element of what I am calling transposition even in the loose modern rendering of a poem relatively as distant as the Divine Comedy. In the sense that Lawrence Marston would call a modern English equivalent for Dante's medieval Italian, this is true translation. But since Dante's language and the generalities of his poem are not with just suitable feeling distances, Marston was able to transpose. He could for example take over Dante's terza rima meter; English allowed him to reproduce, though as a loose version, the rhymes which help to give Dante's line its peculiar concentration; he was able to follow the contour of the syntax and even the patterning of the movement. (Let me quote a single stanza.)
