

Defining Literary Character

I want other characters in the film job. If someone is making leaves in the background while the boys and the heroine are having their night conversation in that autumn park, I am convinced that he should be simply someone making leaves. People do when all other leaves, and so long as he looks like someone making leaves, that is enough for me. I positively do not want him "reused"; in fact, I do not even want him "free." More than that unless his making those leaves adds something somewhere to what is going on, I want him to quit making them and just disappear. He should never have entered in the first place.

Elmer Olson

To see what might be said to illuminate the formal theoretical function of certain scenes in certain novels of Henry James is a rewarding enough problem in itself. In any such activity of literary analysis, however, there are theoretical assumptions involved that one hopes may have some general value that will last beyond the particular act of practical criticism. James, in his felicitous essay on "The Art of Fiction," says that "the successful application of any art is a delightful spectacle, but the literary one is interesting." Now only is it interesting, but it is itself a "delightful study" which ought "in moments of confidence, venture to say a little more what it thinks of itself." With that source of encouragement, I propose now to derive my reader no abstract, my method only as it reveals itself in examples of practical criticism, but, rather, straightforwardly to proceed in as a possible theoretical approach to all literary characters in modern fiction.
