

BLOOD RED, WHITE IRON

watching the little dragon looked as if he might not see many of his, down the nave past the apsidal of dead knights.

Tours to sanctuary beyond the church.
Johane: You must give me the bag, please.
The king and Yolande had come to behind her.

Charles: Johane, Johane, let it go.

Johane: I must have the outline of the imposture with her hand a little tentatively, since she must see clearly.

Johane: You just can't sell the king's touch.

Dean: Mademoiselle, I . . . Your Majesty . . . I must have the Dean.

Yolande suddenly broke the imposture.

Yolande: Give it up Brother Dean. I'll speak to the king.

The dragon came up and surrendered it to Johane.

Yolande: Tell the Dean the money will be returned to the king's evil.

Charles: Tell him I'm sorry.

He had said to Yolande she was his link. Now he was begging pardon for some unamendable part of his own life.

The dragon turned away. Johane imagined the Dean in his sanctuary, his cope off, his accounts book open, waiting to count tally.

Johane: You ought to have more pride, daughter.

Charles wiped his nose.

Charles: No doubt, no doubt.

Yolande left them - out of some sort of anxiety.

Charles: These people - they get their wounds cured. Without me of my king's evil? Who cures me?

Johane's ears prickled.

Johane: You know who.

Charles: And you're like the glove that gets burnt.

She bit on her fist, but found with pain that it was her dagger. Lower lip her teeth were sawing.

Johane: It trails, my pain will end. And Brother Jean -

Charles: Yes!

Johane: His heart will open to me. I'll walk about . . . in the In his garden.

KING MEETS LITTLE

Johane: I don't want you to suffer.
But she could tell his mind had already drifted from her. She understood that he might not feel any deep fever of lecture - even on her day.
It might well be when he was an old king, refused by her sacrifice, a night walk with an incomprehensible pity in his thin heart.

He was now walking in Tours? They ran up a hooppelande, blue velvet, for wearing over her armour. She had forgotten what a noble good male clothes, for cloth-removers, she had.
Then something lying in the armorer's, in the sink of metal - a hat and metal points. Putting on the pieces as appetites were served them on.

Johane: Well, first we have the breast plate, then the back-plate. Then comes down the pannel to protect your belly and two pannelons to hold above your kidneys. And just to prevent a low getting under your breast plate, these metal strips from the side down called trusses. Then six pieces for the arms: the upper, the shoulder . . . you'll get to know them . . . and four pieces for the legs. The shoes are called solerets.

They were strapping her legs in grooved steel. All the time she moved and felt the night seasons in pain.

Johane: It seems very heavy.

Johane: It's the lightest we make - you'll get used to it. How many two English pounds.

On her walk around Tours she kept meeting knights whom Henry was now in English hands. Each of them wanted her to say that, once Orleans was relieved, her thought would tell her to lead the way to exactly the direction of his last real estate.

So when someone called for Jean d'Arden stopped her in the street she thought it's just another hard-up gentleman with a sword and hat properly worth of the Loire. He was a quiet man, but slow.

D'Arden: They call me honest Jean. By that they mean I'm the poorest knight business in the camp. I'm not married because no
