A Retrospective Look Ronald L Oliver, 2020-09-16 This collection looks back at the drawings and paintings done over a lifetime It began with a hunger to create by drawing when I was around twelve years old This book represents a chance to put them altogether into a whole that may make more sense From the start I have used drawing and painting as a way of calming down concentrating and focusing on settling things around me By calling them artwork I could make them look as I wanted them to remain I thought they should speak with my voice and say what I wanted to say It came natural to me because that was what I wanted It was just that simple I still see things that way there is the passing and there is the fixed It seems like there was a basic need to draw paint and express what was inside I could organize and put things together on paper or canvas that went together in no other way at no other time It was a way out of myself and I took it At times it was the best way to do things when was no other way I was first inspired by a glossy photo journal of the early sixties with photographs of Caroline Kennedy on top of a horse They went together and it all made sense Her father was highly esteemed but was later shot while riding a convertible in Dallas but Caroline lives It makes for a sad story but that is the way that many stories go One lives and learns When I later tried to ride a horse in imitation it ran to the middle of an interstate expressway and stopped in its tracks I loved horses until I learned they were not all without fault I found they had a will of their own that was often greater than that of the rider Regardless they were often better on paper than in real life I started drawing with a pencil and charcoal but later graduated to oils paints acrylics pastels and finally watercolours I saved the best for last A Retrospective Exhibition of Paintings, Drawings and Graphic Work , Painter of Vision University of Arizona.
