

MLT Blood Bank/Immunology (Medical Laboratory Technicians) Quiz With Complete Solutions 2024-2025

The blood bank alarm sounded during the night shift and the staff person at the monitoring station recorded the incident, but since the alarm stopped within 5 minutes, the staff person took no further action. In the morning, the day staff noted the alarm documentation and notified the transfusion service. At the time the blood bank temperature were within acceptable ranges. What initial action should be taken by the transfusion service technologist?

A discard all units stored in the refrigeration unit

B check the records from continuous temperature recorder to determine if the refrigeration unit has been out of acceptable range

C perform quality control testing on the alarm system

D no action is needed; the alarm only sounded for five minutes

[Correct Ans: - B check the records from continuous temperature recorder to determine if the refrigeration unit has been out of acceptable range

Rationale: Before making a decision regarding the units in the refrigerator the technologist should determine whether the temperature of the refrigerator was outside of acceptable limits. If not, no further action is warranted with regard to the units stored in the refrigerator. For example, if the alarm had sounded and the temperature in the refrigerator box did not exceed 6.0 degrees Celsius, the units would not be considered compromised. The next step would be to check for an alarm malfunction by following the quality control procedure and, if it would be advisable to move the inventory from the refrigerator to another controlled device or find a reliable alarm backup.

Blood was transported from a blood collection facility to a rural transfusion service. Units were maintained at 1-6 degrees Celsius prior to transport but the temperature of the transport container was 8 degrees Celsius when the shipment was received. What should be done with the units in this shipment?

A the shipment temperature was unacceptable and the units should be discarded

B the shipment temperature was acceptable and the units can be placed into the general inventory

C the shipment temperature was unacceptable and blood should be quarantined for 24 hours and observed for any signs of bacterial growth or hemolysis before being placed into inventory

D the units should only be used if bacterial cultures are performed and they are negative

[Correct Ans: - B the shipment temperature was acceptable and the units can be placed into the general inventory

Rationale: Both the storage and the shipment temperature were acceptable and units are suitable for placement in the general inventory. No additional testing or quarantine is required. This acceptable temperature range for blood storage is 1-6 degrees Celsius and the acceptable temperature range for blood shipment is 1-10 degrees Celsius.
