

ELECTRICITY.

to be beyond the striking distance from the earth, pass quietly without making noise or giving light; unless it meets with other clouds that have less.

Tall trees and lofty buildings, as the towers and spires of churches, become sometimes conductors between the clouds and the earth; but not being good ones, that is, not conducting the fluid freely, they are often damaged.

Buildings that have their roofs covered with lead, or other metal, and spouts of metal continued from the roof into the ground to carry off the water, are never hurt by lightning bolts, whenever it falls on such a building, it passes in the metal and not in the walls.

When other buildings happen to be within the striking distance from such clouds, the fluid passes in the walls when they are of wood, brick, or stone, quaking the walls only when you find better conductors near them, as metal rods, nails, and hinges, windows or doors gliding on wainscot, or frames of pictures, the silvering on the backs of looking-glasses, the silver canisters, and the bodies of animals that contain fluids. And in passing through the house it follows the direction of these conductors, zig-zag as it were in its way, or as it is in its passage, whether in a straight or crooked line, leaping from one to the other, if not in contact from each other, only rending the wall in the places where these partial good conductors are too distant from each other.

And if a rod is placed on the outside of a building, from the top it is continued down into the moist earth, in an either straight or crooked, following the form of the roof or other parts of the building, will receive the lightning at its upper end, attracting it so as to prevent its striking any other part; and, affording it a ready conveyance into the earth, will prevent its damaging any part of the building.

A small quantity of metal is found able to conduct a
