
INCOME DYNAMICS IN COUPLES AND THE DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE AND COHABITATION*

MATTHIJS KALMIJN, ANNEKE LOEVE, AND DORIEN MANTING

Several studies have shown that a wife's strong (socio)economic position is associated with an increase in the risk of divorce. Less is known about such effects for cohabiting relationships. Using a unique and large-scale sample of administrative records from The Netherlands, we analyze the link between couples' income dynamics and union dissolution for married and cohabiting unions over a 10-year period. We find negative effects of household income on separation and positive effects of the woman's relative income, in line with earlier studies. The shape of the effect of the woman's relative income, however, depends on the type of union. Movements away from income equality toward a male-dominant pattern tend to increase the dissolution risk for cohabiting couples, whereas they reduce the dissolution risk for married couples. Movements away from income equality toward a female-dominant pattern (reverse specialization) increase the dissolution risks for both marriage and cohabitation. The findings suggest that equality is more protective for cohabitation, whereas specialization is more protective for marriage, although only when it fits a traditional pattern. Finally, we find that the stabilizing effects of income equality are more pronounced early in the marriage and that income equality also reduces the dissolution risk for same-sex couples.

There is growing evidence on the importance of wife's economic independence for the dissolution of marriage. Studies have generally found that the risk of divorce is increased when the wife is working for pay and when the wife works more hours (Becker, Landes, and Michael 1977; Blossfeld and Muller 2002; Bracher et al. 1993; Cherlin 1979; De Rose 1992; Heckert, Nowak, and Snyder 1998; Jalovaara 2003; Manting and Loeve 2004; Poortman and Kalmijn 2002; South 2001; Von Gostomski, Hartmann, and Kopp 1998; Wagner 1993). The evidence is found both in the United States and in Europe. Theoretically, these effects are most often interpreted in terms of reduced specialization gains on the one hand and lower financial exit costs on the other hand (Becker 1981; Cherlin 1979, 1992; Oppenheimer 1997; Schoen et al. 2002).

Although the number of studies examining the link between women's socioeconomic position and divorce has increased greatly in recent years, important gaps in our knowledge remain. First, most of the evidence applies to the effect of the wife's labor force participation and—largely because of longitudinal data limitations—fewer studies have examined effects of partners' dynamic income levels. Hence, the evidence for relative income effects on separation so far is less consistent than the evidence for the effect of wife's employment (Rogers 2004). Some studies have found a clear positive effect of the wife's income share on divorce (Heckert et al. 1998; Jalovaara 2003; Liu and Vikat 2004); some authors have found an inverted U-shaped effect, with high levels of divorce occurring when husbands and wives have equal incomes (Rogers 2004); yet other authors have found a U-shaped effect of wife's income on separation, with high levels of divorce occurring when the wife has a low or a very high income (Ono 1998).

Second, we know little about economic influences on the dissolution of cohabiting relationships. An increasing number of unmarried couples live together, and these unions are
