

Animal invaders

How much danger are we in? How many invaders are there?

Imagine you run a small food shop in your local neighbourhood. Suddenly, a giant supermarket opens for business opposite your shop. What happens to you and your business?

In the natural world, things are often the same. The red squirrel was living happily in England when, in the 1880s, many people brought grey squirrels from North America as pets. These pets escaped into the wild and ate the same food as the red squirrels, which means that now there aren't many native red squirrels in England and they are in danger of extinction.

There are many invaders that don't cause extinctions, but they do destroy plants and harm the economy. For example, European red deer are destroying the forests in South America because they eat the young trees. Rabbits have spread from Europe and now eat farmers' crops all over the world. These kinds of invaders cause problems for humans, unlike the grey squirrels, which cause little damage to plants and don't damage the economy.

Few invaders are large land animals; most of them are plants or small animals like insects. These smaller animals often mean farmers lose a lot of money. For example, the apple snail from South America doesn't cause much harm in Europe, but it causes a lot of damage in South-East Asia because it loves to eat rice plants.

For several obvious reasons, the number of animal invaders is increasing in every country in the world, and many countries hope to control this situation with, for example, strong border controls.

However, it seems impossible for us to bring such animal invasions to a stop, perhaps because changes are always part of nature.
