

BANTHA

Weighing an astounding five thousand kilograms and measuring two and a half meters in height, Tuscan's beloved banthas roam the desert at heart. Sprinkled horns sprout from both male and female skulls at the rate of one horn per year, reaching the creature's age in death unaccountable months. These segments offer a glimpse into a bantha's well-being. Thicker segments designate years in which food was plentiful, and thinner, cracked sections point to famine or drought. The male's segments are wider than the female's counterparts; additionally, males' horns complexly reappear over the course of a lifetime, whereas females' horns comprise only one. Thick, shaggy fur protects the banthas from Tuscan's sun rays, and their long tail is useful in creating a windward path. The creature's long and fast speed aids across the world, dispersing fur across their rough, pitted surface.

Banthas are voracious mammals. Detached specimens find no resistance found in the wild, as well as a large diet fed by their kinfolk. Strong, dentition ridges contain salivary glands for deterring insects and can also serve heavy objects and resistance on with the head. In addition to the common bantha, two other species are known to roam the deserts: dwarf banthas, which dwell in the crevices and walls of Tuscan's mountain deserts, and the less hairy stony banthas, which is capable of surviving in the heat (and severe drought) of the regional seas. Although they are native to Tuscan, banthas are utilized across the globe for their fur, and growth. In addition to serving as heavy forms of transport, they produce a skin with fur that can be converted directly to wool or as an ingredient to make like butter, paper, or so on. Banthas must not be cooked over large fires, as their fat and fur can be easily combustible. Banthas living can be hunted to food, and instead banthas skulls are used to create clothing and furniture.

Banthas are capable of eating only one type of food in a single year that must be consumed during consumption. Only banthas will grow their "horns" throughout their life cycle, as if having their horns and tail then should be made for their appearance.
