Myonecrosis and Myoglobinuria in Alcohol and Barbiturate Intoxication. [In English.] H. FAHLGREN, R. HED and C. LUNDMARK. Acta medica Scandinavica [Acta med. scand.], 158, 405-412, Oct. 15, 1957. 6 figs., 10 refs.

From Södersjukhuset, Stockholm, 5 cases of myonecrosis in male alcoholics are reported; in one case there was concurrent barbituric acid intoxication. The clinical features included aching and tenderness of the affected muscles with considerable oedema which could be mistaken for venous thrombosis. There were 2 deaths, probably in hyperpotassaemia. In 3 of the patients myoglobin was demonstrated spectroscopically in the urine. Necrosis of the muscles was confirmed histologically in 4 cases.

The part played by alcohol and barbituric acid in the aetiology of myonecrosis is discussed. Norval Taylor

Contribution of New Immunological Methods to the Problem of the Identification of Human Blood. (Apport des méthodes immunologiques récentes au problème de l'identification du sang humain.) J. M. FINE. Annales de l'Institut Pasteur [Ann. Inst. Pasteur], 93, 592-601, Nov., 1957. 1 fig., 9 refs.

The decision whether or not a stain is due to human blood is probably the most important in the whole domain of forensic medicine, so that any technique that can help towards this is to be welcomed. The author describes from the Institut Pasteur, Paris, experiments designed to compare the relative value of two techniques, (1) the inhibition of human antiglobulin, and (2) the specific precipitation in an agar-gel of human serum, with and without previous electrophoresis.

Factors affecting the specificity of the first reaction were examined, especially the inhibitory action of the serum of various animal species or of different globulins on human antiglobulin sera and the possible influence of the species of animal on the test. Three antiglobulin sera were tested against human serum and serum from the chimpanzee, cynocephalus monkey, horse, goat, ox, sheep, dog, rabbit, and guinea-pig. The chimpanzee serum gave exactly the same reactions as the human, and that of the cynocephalus monkey a partial reaction. Although this antigenic community is only of theoretical importance in temperate zones, it would be important in areas where monkeys are common. In a study of the second technique specific precipitation in agar-gel was performed, (a) after double diffusion, and (b) after immuno-electrophoresis. A series of antigens was prepared from human and animal sources together with gamma globulin from 6 animal species, excluding monkeys. Precipitating immune sera were made from these and tested against 13 human sera and sera from 12 animal species, ranging from chimpanzees to hens. A striking finding was the almost complete identity of the human and chimpanzee sera; there was also some interaction with other animal species. Immuno-electrophoresis also showed a striking resemblance between human and chimpanzee sera, not only in regard to immunology, but also in the actual migration of the serum constituents.

The author admits that the facts he reports are mainly of theoretical importance. Of the two techniques, precipitation in an agar-gel is the more useful, but he considers that the inhibition of human antiglobulin is simpler and more specific and seems to be the best test for medico-legal work at the present time. The Precipitin Test in Elucidating the Cause of Death. R. J. MUELLING, R. F. SAMSON and T. BEVEN. American Journal of Clinical Pathology [Amer. J. clin. Path.], 28, 489-494, Nov., 1957. 1 fig., 1 ref.

The authors, writing from Louisiana State University School of Medicine, New Orleans, draw attention to the value of the precipitin test in elucidating the cause of death in certain circumstances. Examples of its use are given in four case histories: (1) the demonstration of cobra venom in the tissues of a girl said to have been bitten by a cobra; (2) the demonstration of a precipitin for benzylpenicillin and none for horse serum in a patient to whom these substances had been administered, and who was suspected of having died from anaphylaxis; (3) the demonstration of specific antibodies to horse serum in tissue homogenates from a negro who had died within 5 minutes of receiving the usual
