Since the panel's report was released in 2000, these concepts have become known as the "five pillars" of early literacy and reading instruction.

Goodwin, 1994 Computer-assisted Reading Instruction for Special Education Students Diane S. Blodgett, 2001 Since 1974 when the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act was first passed three major trends have been merging with dramatic changes for both special education teachers and students These trends involved social change legislative change and technological change While at first offering great usually unqualified promise of revolutionizing special education reading instruction these trends have developed into a more realistic less emotional arena of what really works and why While early pioneers in computer assisted instruction were prophetic in defining and guiding the developments in this field by applying improved hardware and software technology especially interactive software developed and proven commercially the role of the teacher and by implication teacher training and preparation has been increasingly called into question This thesis reviews the history of these trends as they merged into one national law IDEA and by drawing on those lessons and subsequent research focuses on how teachers teacher training institutions and school districts can more effectively evaluate software comply with the laws regarding Individual Education Plans IEPs and work to best deliver the specific individualized reading instruction that this author predicts will increasingly be mandated in more IEPs As a final note one classroom is examined in detail in light of the literature and research to share what actually works for both assessment and computer assisted reading instruction as mandated by formal IEP procedures for middle school special needs students in an urban setting leaf 4
