

Contradictions in Chinese language reform

CHIN-CHUAN CHENG

It is well known that languages change as they are used, but they also remain quite stable. Change and stability are conflicting forces, but they interact to keep language alive and at the same time maintain an equilibrium so that communication is not rendered impossible. Due to the same interaction of these forces, the Chinese writing system continually changes as new characters are introduced for semantic distinction and complex ones simplified for ease of use. In China at the turn of this century, script simplification became a much stronger force because of a political focus on the education of the populace as a democratization process. The 'vulgar', simpler, variant characters of the low culture of the traditional Chinese plays and fiction printed since the tenth century were seriously studied by scholars (Liu and Li 1930). In the early 1950s, the ideology that considered the masses as the motive forces of history dictated that the 'vulgar' characters be officially recognized. The draft of the first Chinese Character Simplification Scheme was compiled in 1954 and distributed for discussion in 1955. In 1956 the Scheme was finalized and officially promulgated by the State Council of the People's Republic of China. During the formative years of this Scheme, people from all walks of life participated in shaping its final version.

In handwriting, the script continued to evolve in the direction of simplification. The Committee on Language Reform collected more simplified characters in circulation during the 1960s and the early 1970s. In order to give due recognition to these newly created characters, it announced the Draft of the Second Simplification Scheme for comments in December 1977. This Draft contained 853 simplified characters and 61 simplified character components. Many writings about this Draft were published. For a while, it seemed that the announcement was a most timely event. But since 1979, only a year after the announcement, one hardly finds any news items or articles about the Draft. In my view, this silence is entirely contrary to the work style of the Committee on Language Reform during the 1950s. It also goes against the tradition of Chinese intellectuals and linguistic scholars who had always written about and contributed to the work of language reform.
