

Counselor Training Applications Computer-Assisted Counseling: Problems and Prospects

MORTON WAGMAN
KENNETH W. KERBER

Recent computer-assisted counseling systems have been designed to treat specific types of psychological problems for which clearly articulated treatment strategies are available. Examples of such systems are MORTON, a program designed to treat mild to moderate depression, and PLATO ICS, a program for the treatment of moderately difficult mood-affective disorders. PLATO ICS and MORTON might be valuable for training counselors in treatment strategies for dealing with depression and depression. In addition, counselor trainers can respond in these systems as clients and can use them as simulations. Computer-aided or object counseling techniques might lead to significant theoretical advances because techniques must be clearly and correctly articulated to make computer applications feasible. Possible limitations of computer-assisted counseling are discussed, including ethics and counselor acceptance of computers as therapists and the limited ability of the computer to understand natural language.

The availability of computers has had a significant impact on clinical psychology with respect to psychological testing, interviewing, and diagnosis (Robinson, 1973; Spurr, 1981). However, perhaps the most controversial computer application in psychology involves the use of computers as therapists (DeWeaver, 1963; Feltman, Geist, Klein, Jefferson, & Gerst, 1981; Zarr, 1984). For example, Weizenbaum (1976) and Spero (1978) question the appropriateness of computer-based therapy, whereas Colby (1980) and Crist (1980) see definite advantages to this application.

It is beyond the scope of this article to discuss the appropriateness of using computers as therapists (see Alexander, 1978) or to discuss the ethical questions that arise from this application (see Sampson & Pyle,
