

Defining Statistical Inference

Estimation

Estimation is the process of using sample data to estimate the value of a population parameter. There are two main types of estimation: point estimation and interval estimation.

Estimation is the process of using sample data to estimate the value of a population parameter. There are two main types of estimation: point estimation and interval estimation. Point estimation involves using a single value to estimate a population parameter, while interval estimation involves using a range of values to estimate a population parameter. Interval estimation is further divided into confidence intervals and prediction intervals. Confidence intervals are used to estimate the value of a population parameter, while prediction intervals are used to estimate the value of a future observation. Both confidence intervals and prediction intervals are based on the normal distribution and the t-distribution. The normal distribution is used when the population standard deviation is known, and the t-distribution is used when the population standard deviation is unknown. The z-score and t-score are used to calculate confidence intervals, while the t-score and f-score are used to calculate prediction intervals.
