Baker's journey is not straightforward. It's a mix of the mysterious and the downright magical. And yet, your grandparents knew how to bake bread, and so did their grandfathers. It's not like the wizardry and magic of the most basic ingredients for baking bread are mixed together and left to ferment for a number of days to form a tart. The tart then feeds with flour, water, and salt to keep it alive, fermenting. This allows for a very different, more flavorful, and longer fermentation, resulting in a stronger flavor. This tart is then used to make a loaf of bread with a strong flavor. So, bakers have tart for many years. Bread can be made much more quickly with yeast, which is better for health. The kick starts the fermentation, and it can be made in a few hours rather than a few days. All the ingredients are mixed together and left to ferment. Bulk fermentation is then shaped, and proofed before baking. Different flour is used in bread production, resulting in very varying flour. The most common is wheat flour, and while most of these contain gluten, the amount is different. Thick rustic bread needs to be baked at a very high temperature in the region of 220°C or above, however, not true enriched doughs, though, because they will burn at the high temperature. Finally, it's important to let the bread cool sufficiently before diving in. Baking is the bread while it is still hot, with a high level of steam, and will result in a loaf that is dry and underbaked. You will be rewarded.
