The California-Mexico Connection Abraham F. Lowenthal, Katrina Burgess, Assistant Professor of International Political Economy Fletcher School Katrina Burgess, 1993 Not since the early nineteenth century when California was still part of Mexico have there been such close ties between Mexico and its former northern territory Today one Californian in five is of Mexican heritage compared with fewer than one in ten in 1970 California is Mexico's second largest trading partner after Texas and Mexico is California's second largest export market after Japan Millions of people from southern California and northern Mexico engage each day in an intricate web of transactions in which the border is much less significant than shared aims and interactions California's growing Mexican connection shapes the state's life in many ways other than economic from culture to cuisine schools to boardrooms workplace to voting booth This book is the first in any language to explore the nature scope and effects of the California Mexico connection It analyzes the movements of people goods money politics and culture across the California Mexico border and explores its implications for both parties By bringing together experts on Mexico California and the issue areas where they intersect the fourteen papers in this book not only describe and analyze the connection but consider how Mexicans and Californians can help assure that the connection's effects are more consistently and mutually positive The book is in four parts Part I situates the California Mexico connection in comparative and theoretical terms and provides an overview from the Mexican perspective on the mutual impact of California and Mexico Part II outlines demographic economic political and social changes in Mexico and how they are affecting California Part III focuses on Mexico's presence within California and its impact on society education health labor politics and the economy Part IV analyzes what can be done by Mexicans and Californians to strengthen the positive effects of the California Mexico connection
