Procurement practices have been identified as the bedrock to achieving value for money within both private and public sector organisations. This study investigates the effect of procurement practices on public service delivery, by analysing the perspectives of respondents collected using questionnaires. The response rate of sampled respondents was 96%. From the analysis of demographic characteristics of the respondents, majority has the following attributes: (i) tertiary level of education, (ii) are males, (iii) aged between 30 to 39 years, and (iv) have experience ranging from 1 to 5 years. There is absence of multicollinearity in the variables. The estimates from the multiple regression analysis suggest that procurement policy, procurement planning and sustainable procurement have positive and significant effect on public service delivery at the 5% percent significance level. The researchers therefore conclude that procurement practices have positive and significant influence on public service delivery. A major managerial implication of these findings therefore is that procurement practices is a key driver of service delivery in public institutions.

INTRODUCTION

The import of procurement practices is well established in literature. It is the process of determining the procurement needs and the timing of their acquisition and funding such that the entire operations are met as required in an efficient way. According to Saunders (1997), procurement practices aim at anticipating requirements, sourcing and obtaining supplies, moving supplies into the organization, and monitoring the status of supplies as a current asset. The contribution of procurement practices is perceived in terms of quality, delivery, cost and flexibility, which has an impact on the competitive capability of the firm to meet customer requirements. Mdemu (2013) identified the following as motivation for preparing procurement practices: avoid rush orders which can be cost full, timely delivery of requirements, proper selection of procurement method which is adherence of regulations, procure the right quality of items, right quantity, from the right vendor/supplier at the right time and cost due to proper analysis and specifications. Thus, a mistake in procurement practices may culminate into diverse implications in the organization that may deter its progress.

Service Delivery is conceptualised as the extent to which service has been delivered according to the communities as the beneficiaries of the particular services. It is the set of principles, standards, policies and constraints used to guide the design, development, deployment, operation and
