Psychological experimentation became a collaborative effort dependent on a division of labor among individuals who carried out different functions in the experimental situation. Although this distinction was essentially a response to the practical exigencies of late nineteenth-century “brass instruments” experimentation and not the product of deep reflection, it rapidly became traditionalized. To carry out sophisticated experiments with relatively complex apparatus, one now had to assign the function of data source and the function of experimental manipulation to different people.

What was not noticed at the time, or indeed for almost a century afterward, was that this arrangement created a special kind of social system – one of psychological experimentation. The interaction between subjects and experimenters was regulated by a system of social constraints that set strict limits to what passed between them. Their communication in the experimental situation was governed by the roles they had assumed and was hedged around by taken-for-granted prescriptions and proscriptions.

However, the specific features of this social system were not necessarily fixed. The basic division of labor between experimenters and subjects still left much room for local variation.
