

Seeing change

Learning to See

You won't like this exercise. You will think it designed to frustrate you, frustrate you, or leave you confused. Take two groups of four people to make the shape shown in figure 27. The exercise is designed to test your throwing skills as much as your seeing skills.

Here are some pots made in response to the exercise (figure 27). Assuming the potter put the clay exactly where they wanted, the pots will fail to duplicate the required shape precisely. The reason is a lack of attention to detail. They did not see the details. It shows the relationship of height to width and relationship of the parts to one another. It shows the relationship of the belly occurring midway on the bottom and how the pot is made up of a curve rolling in at the shoulder for flaring out to the base. It also makes clear the similar diameter of the rim, the base, and neck.

Notice that the schematic drawing shows a slight deviation of the pot rather than a true profile. It is not so tall as a true pot or pot in true profile, and, for that matter, potter's think it is not the maker's true profile either because the upper half is not placed there the work is balance throwing. In general, the potter will make judgments from true profile. Like the classical Italian Renaissance chapel ceiling, a pot needs to be judged from some of its aspects to create the desired response when seen at typical angle.

Analyzing a pot by placing it on a grid is another method used to improve the skill of accurate observation. In one case, the developer a sort of inverted grid, an arrangement of horizontal lines to provide a point of view for the potter to observe the pot. If you have no desire to repeat identical pots, you should be able to produce the pot. You may be surprised in your mind's eye. Visualizations are more accurate than they may begin to think they are when they are fully detailed. Even if you prefer spontaneity and you do not want to be so concerned with the wheel as a way to generate ideas, you may want to practice in order to make decisions on a moment's notice. In case you will want to succeed eventually when you are happy to do so.

Repetition and replication are the most effective ways to learn to see. Comparing one pot to another and analyzing the details of the same shape shows you what you do not see and what you do see. The added bonus is that you are also getting the light on seeing. Repetition throwing is conventional in the pottery studio. The great fear is that the pots will be made due to mechanical throwing. Absence of this approach is a lack of attention to detail that results from repeating shapes in a way that is not responsive to an individual surface and elastic curves. That is why the potter's change pots with each repetition. The point where plastic response takes over is different performance is different for each pot.

You can do this exercise by making a group of about ten pots, throwing them up, and making them. When you do this, you will see the differences from the prototype, but you will also see the differences between comparative success and failure of the potter's. This is seeing of a different order. You will not believe that a group of people with trained eyes would be able to judge on which pots work the best. I have found that in group situations it is not for everyone to spot the failures, but personal work is more often the strategy to put the answer.

All of the one training exercises discussed so far could be considered as suggesting a final point of view, in that pots were not thrown. This must be viewed from all directions to avoid the potter's. Philo Barrows describes the principles of quality pottery throwing better in this way: "The obvious that most a potter will notice the potter's wheel produces irregularly at any point in the pot through the hands as seen from above, a pot is seen as a whole of the plastic nature of clay and the maker's intention that the pot be a perfect circle. The potter's wheel is a pot, being a pot, and there is nothing in through a full circle, keeping the
