University crew members compete in a spring regatta at Fern Ridge Reservoir.

Crew keeps competitive despite minimal finances

By Maile Field
Emerald Contributor

The 10-year history of the University crew team is rich in victories as well as financial problems. The team is one of the smallest on the west coast, with about 50 full-time students participating.

It also has one of the smallest budgets among its competitors.

But the Ducks have a reputation as being one of the hardest crew teams to beat from Canada to Southern California. Last spring three University crews won their divisions at the Pacific Coast Rowing Championships in Sacramento, Calif., in the world's largest collegiate rowing competition.

While some other schools select rowers and offer scholarships, men's crew coach Andy Joss looks at recruiting a little differently. "We don't reject anybody," he said.

Every year the University crew team's first meeting packs the EMU Forum Room with more than 150 potential and returning rowers. But by spring term, only about one quarter of that number will remain on the team. "Anybody can row," Joss said. "The only requirements are hard work and dedication."

Because of financial problems, University rowers might have to do a little more work than do other teams' members.

University Club Sports pays about $8,000 toward the crew team's travelling and equipment expenses, but the team spends twice that amount.

This means that the rowers themselves must come up with the money. A commitment to crew means more than three hours of daily workouts. It often means spending 10 to 12 hours on a Saturday or a Sunday cleaning Astren Stadium or McArthur Court.

According to Joss, the team can expect to be paid about $1,400 per clean-up. But because only groups of 55 or more members regularly get the jobs, it is an un dependable source of income.

Women's coach Sasha Stone says the only apparent solution to the money problem is for each rower to pay a $100 user fee to help offset loan payments on equipment and maintenance and repair fees for the team's bus. In previous years the team has received funds from alumni, T-shirt sales and bake sales.

Turn to Crew, Page 9

Rower Bob Vogel, a senior in planning, public policy and management, has incorporated the crew team's financial problems into his senior project. Vogel's goals are high. His current efforts include an attempt to get a company who makes rowing shells to donate a four-person boat to the team.

A four-year member of the University crew team, Vogel and junior journalism major Geoff Mosag are preparing for national team testing in December. If they are accepted, they could represent the United States in international competition.

Up until and including last year, University crew teams have been considered a threat to other teams in national competition. However, lack of financial support has prevented the team from carrying out those threats.

Joss, coaching the men for his third consecutive year, has been rowing for a decade himself and has competed in world championships.

Stone, the women's coach, began as a rower with the University team three years ago, and was as a novice part of the varsity lightweight crew that won at the Pacific Coast Rowing Championships in 1985.

Stone is new to coaching, but she said that this year's new rowers are doing exceedingly well considering how long they have rowed. Although practices are going well, only two members of the team of about 25 have had any experience, and more coxswains are needed, she said.

Coxswains command and steer the boats, must be small (preferably less than 110 pounds) and must have loud voices.
