

The Federal Depository Library Program in 2023: One Perspective on the Transition to the Future

Peter Hernon and Laura Saunders

The Government Printing Office (GPO) administers a depository library program that provides the public with access to government publications, including digital ones. For years, the GPO, its Depository Library Council, and documents librarians have discussed the future role of member libraries. This article explores a different, but critical, perspective: that of directors of university libraries within the Association of Research Libraries. Thirty directors reviewed different scenarios and selected the one they envision their university assuming. The findings have implications for librarians in any depository library program and others interested in the future role of libraries as collection and service centers for government information resources.

In an analysis of how the national government informs, communicates with, and shares information with the American citizenry, historian Culver H. Smith writes:

Beginning in 1789, the new government turned to newspapers to supply some needed services. Selected newspapers were employed by the Department of State to publish the laws, orders, and resolutions of Congress. By this means the federal government established contacts with the citizenry in the growing nation... In addition, certain Washington newspaper proprietors were elected publishers for Congress to perform a large and responsible function and a few editors voluntarily recorded the congressional debate, thus relieving Congress of this duty.¹

In addition to the role newspapers played, there were other venues to promote public access to news about what the national government is doing and to information generated by it. Among these were libraries, most of which became depository libraries.

Background

The depository library program, which the Government Printing Office (GPO), a legislative agency, now administers, dates from 1813, when Congress first authorized legislation to ensure that one copy of congressionally distributed publications
