Pediatric Emergence Delirium: A Case Study

The pathophysiology of emergence delirium (ED) remains a mystery. Using a case study approach, ED is discussed from a clinical perspective. The case is a 4-year-old male who had myringotomy tube placement while anesthetized with sevoflurane. The negative outcome for this child is presented. The epidemiology of the phenomena is reviewed and definitions are examined. Several methods to assess ED are presented, accompanied by a discussion of the development of assessment tools. Research findings are included that address the possible causes of ED including preoperative anxiety, rapid awakening, pain, and a predisposition for this phenomenon in certain children. Various interventions, both pharmacologic and nonpharmacologic are considered. The impact of anesthesia on pediatric brain development is discussed and finally some possible solutions are hypothesized.

OBJECTIVES—1. List several factors that can impact on the incidence of ED in children. 2. List at least two interventions to reduce the incidence of ED in children. 3. Analyze the research that has been conducted to understand ED in children.

The pathophysiology of emergence delirium (ED) remains a mystery. Approximately 450,000 children aged less than 18 years have surgical procedures requiring anesthesia every year. Of these, 25% are aged less than 3 years. Administering anesthesia to pediatric patients is fraught with potential complications. However, mortality and morbidity in healthy children who have routine procedures with anesthesia is rare. Patterns of brain injury have not been identified in more than 4 million children exposed to anesthesia.¹

Pediatric airways are anatomically different than adult airways and maintaining patency is vital and can become complicated. However, children are also subject to a multitude of other problems when undergoing surgery. Animal studies reveal that there are neurotoxic effects of anesthetic agents on the developing brain.² Pediatric postoperative ED is a recognized phenomenon and may occur because of this neurotoxic effect. The incidence of ED in surgical patients of all ages is 5.3% with an incidence in children of 12% to 13%.² ED is two to three times more common in children than in adults.³

Case Study

John is a 4-year-old male who was scheduled for myringotomy surgery. The Certified Registered Nurse Anesthetist (CRNA) visited John and his parents in the preoperative area. The parents described John as a healthy, well-behaved 4-year-old. He attends prekindergarten and enjoys time with other children. He obeys rules and is usually cooperative. His physical development has been
