Mattock,Jeremy Arkes,2007 The U S Air Force USAF needs accurate models to develop retention policies that ensure the force has a sufficient number of experienced officers to meet current and future requirements The dynamic retention model DRM can be used to take into account the effect of the availability of multi year contracts to certain classes of Air Force officers Unlike the annualized cost of leaving ACOL model long used by researchers working on USAF personnel issues the DRM takes into account the value an officer may place on future career flexibility in the face of uncertainty and thus is particularly well suited to examining the effect of bonus programs that have service commitments such as the Aviator Continuation Pay ACP program which pays an annual bonus to pilots and certain groups of navigators and air battle managers who commit to extend their service for specified numbers of years or to a specified length of service Design of an Econometric Module to Support the ODCSPER Strength Management Systems Redesign Patrick C.
