Johnson,1983 Plant Closing Checklist ,1990 Plant Closing Checklist ,1986 Manufacturing Plant Or Facility Closings Richard J. Brittnacher,2001 All too many companies large or small frequently have been forced to close offices manufacturing plants or facilities Extensive literature exists that explains causes effects and results of downsizing or restructuring on corporations and employees This paper focuses on actual plant closure activities examining the processes and procedures needed to shut down a facility It proposes a set of best practice facility closure guidelines that provides direction to an enterprise once it makes a decision to close a plant or facility The paper also provides suggestions as to any counseling or career transition programs soon to be ex employees could expect The discussion begins after the actual decision is made to shut down a plant The manuscript examines general activities that take place from managerial human resource and employee perspectives to close a facility due to corporate restructuring It assumes the company remains in business Most of the concepts are similar whether the facility that closes is an office or a manufacturing plant The first step in the plant shutdown process is to plan the closure strategy The plan undertaken should be firm yet flexible enough to provide for unforeseen circumstances In an extended closure process consistent communication from management is the most critical tool needed to achieve successful results. It must be truthful and honest and take place throughout the process. The financial picture should be considered with closure costs estimated in advance, accounted for during, and reported after the process has been concluded. Historically, providing extended benefits and retention bonuses have been valuable practices in successfully completing the unpleasant task of closing a company. They are important options in any plant closure strategy. Closure activities taken from three representative mid-sized organizations: Signetics, Siemens, Westinghouse, and U.S. Leather provide a range of successful and not so successful plant shutdown efforts.

Why Do So Many Good Assembly Plants Close? Toward a New Plant Stakeholder and Total Lifecycle Management Strategy Jeff Shockley, Patrick Collignon, Xiaojin (Jim) Liu, 2020. A strategic approach for managing stakeholder interests is critical for global assembly plant site development and management. Using data culled from 1,214 articles on 35 notable assembly plant closures in the automotive and heavy truck industries from 1995-2018, this paper documents both the stated rationale and the stakeholder impact of each closure. A novel strategic planning and decision-making framework then offers some guidance for plant site development that leverages current thinking about industrial lifecycle and stakeholder-driven management strategies. The resulting framework informs some practical guidance for both current plant managers and the heads of global manufacturing strategy who wish to begin the process.
