Abstract

The poem "Fern Hill" is interpreted as autobiographical and reminiscent of Dylan Thomas's boyhood holidays. A reading of the figurative language of the poem, the process of playing with its tropes can be the basis of right interpretation independent of the poet's life or an historical context. As the poem seeks to be persuasive and objective, it relies more on the tropes suggesting the sufferings of the fallen poets of the thirties and the war poet of the forties owing to their wild love of the transcendental art of W.H. Auden's Poems (1930) considered as touchstone of great poetry and a hope for self-advancement in life. However, it is the paradoxical poems of Thomas and his vicarious poetical character that have rehabilitated and revamped the depressed poets. "Fern Hill" reaffirms and reassures the continuation of the same sceptic poetic tradition and culture which Thomas has cherished in all the preceding and the succeeding poems. What this paper, keeping the contemporary poets's passion for Auden's greatness and glory, their dreams and destinations as focal point, strives to convey is the liberating power of Thomas's moral disinterestedness, his vicarious comic vision and his poetic process of life-in-death contrasted with the amoral aesthetic disinterestedness of Auden, his historic tradition and his poetic process of death-in-life.

Keywords: stylistic, nostalgic, transcendence, paradox, juvenile, mutability, and christianism.

1. Introduction

The fact that the poem "Fern Hill" is written in an adopted style, however perfect, conditions the reader's response; its paradoxical structure and its ambiguous language further hinder right appreciation. The experiment with the symbolic form of paradox -- and the poetry of Dylan Thomas is, indeed, in the nature of an experiment -- still continues to fascinate critics and poets. Cecil Day Lewis outlines the paradoxical structure and moral disinterestedness underlying the poem: "Into the crowd of your haunting fancies ... the stream, the aim, the dew ... the soldier shades and the solitary heartbeats ... you melt, and fame pursues" (Collected Poems 282). He disagrees with the general sentiment and compliments Thomas on the feat of "Audenesque musical structure in "Fern Hill" when he says that "the whole as gracefully formed and characterized ... as a poem of your own," "that a true poet's age is truthfully reckoned ... not in years but in song." "here is a loving-cup made from verse ... for verse is your favourite of metals ..." (DCP). What strikes the reader most is the stylistic advance achieved in a remarkably short period, the technical excellence, the magnificent rhetorical diction and versification that is evident in the poem.

Throughout his poetic career Thomas continues his search for the proper vehicle, and in the later poem Deaths and Entrances this search is intimately connected with his appraisal of the poetry of the past. His most favourite poem, A.E. Houseman's Last Poems, seems to achieve the necessary fusion of largeness and depth, but Thomas still feels an inward compulsion to attempt the Audenesque manner although his 18 Poems is an indirect repudiation of W.H. Auden's elegant art. His renewed study of Auden's Poems (1930), while concerning the later poem Deaths and Entrances, the gaudium "of a hawk's vertical stooping from the sky" (Auden, Poems 70) to which he responds with gusto, helps to revive the urge. His speculations on co-existence and fellow-feelings may have re-orientated his ideal poetic character, but his experiences during the war and the need to extricate himself from the deepening shadows of depression prompt a return to Auden. Again, as Thomas suggests, he wants at least to try to attain the artistic stature of Auden even if his poetry is to follow a different direction:

On almost the incendiary eve
 Of several near deaths,
 When one of the great least of your best loved
 And always must leave
 Lions and fires of his flying breath ... (Poems 47)

The question that inevitably arises is whether and how far the germinating conception is modified and altered as a result of his inward cogitations about his own poetic destiny and by the presence of events in the intervening months.
