Jullian Allen,United States. National Aeronautics and Space Administration,1963 The aerodynamic heating characteristics during Earth s atmosphere entry at speeds greater than Earth parabolic speed are calculated for vehicles of conical shape Ablative heat shields are assumed for these bodies and both laminar and turbulent boundary layers are considered It is shown that if conical shape can be maintained an optimum cone angle will exist and a cone of this angle will be superior to the more usual blunt entry shapes at speed well in excess of parabolic speed The improvement result from the fact that radiative heat transfer contributions from the shock layer are much reduced for the cones so that although the convective contributions are increased a net gain is realized For optimum cones the approximate analysis indicates that the convective contributions constitute 85 to 90 percent of the total heating Solutions to the problem of maintaining conical shape as ablation progresses are considered and some experimental demonstration of means for accomplishing this are presented Index of Conference Proceedings Received, 1974-1978 British Library.
