Martschenko,2026-02-03 Debating the use of genomic tools and their societal impact Over the past decade the field of human genetics has produced an extraordinary range of discoveries including the refinement of polygenic scores which use a person s DNA to estimate their likelihood of developing a trait or disease But are these new technologies ready to leave the research lab and be deployed in schools fertility clinics and the wider world In What We Inherit Sam Trejo and Daphne Martschenko offer different perspectives on the societal impact of the rapidly unfolding DNA revolution Trejo a sociologist and expert on the complex ways people s genes influence their life s trajectory believes that new genomic tools if used thoughtfully can improve society Martschenko a bioethicist who specializes in the thorny social issues raised by biomedical advances is more cautious They debate both the risks and the opportunities posed by such new technologies as at home genetic tests and polygenic embryo selection all while engaging in a wide ranging dialogue on ideology biology and social inequality While grappling with these new technologies Trejo and Martschenko remind us that we inherited from our ancestors not only DNA but also wrongheaded ideas about genes Together they caution against two particularly harmful genetic myths that genes determine an individual s future and that race and genetics are inherently connected A polygenic score for example is not a definitive marker for disease And race is a sociopolitical construct not a biological identity Trejo and Martschenko argue that to avoid exacerbating social inequality we need to begin regulating genomic tools sooner rather than later The Family ,1930
