

A CHILD WIDOW'S STORY

MONICA FELTON

"I was born," she explained, "on the dark side of the moon." It was at an hour between the waning of the old moon and the waxing of the new, and according to her aunt, children born at that time are endowed with exceptionally obstinate characters. "Well," she continued, acknowledging what everyone who knows her recognizes as self-evident truth, "I suppose I am. And why not? How can anybody get anything done if they are perpetually taking advice and wondering what other people will think of their actions? You have to be a little bit obstinate if you are to be of any use in this world ... But who am I?" She paused, pulled out the battery case of her deaf-aid and gave it a tentative, disapproving, and then suddenly violent shake. "Nobody! Whoever heard of me?" "Then," I answered, "it's time they did." "No, no, You are wrong. Anyone given my opportunities could have done as much as I have done." "Possibly. But most people don't use their opportunities. You did. That's what makes you important," I said. "Important!" She laughed scornfully. "Who cares about being important? Being useful is the only thing that matters."

a moving and inspiring biography of a charming woman and the story of her great reform
