

Recognition of the role of environmental factors in shaping behavior.

An emphasis on the role of reinforcement in shaping behavior.

Mental health conditions are the result of learned behaviors and environmental factors, rather than as biologically based medical illnesses.

While the behavioral model of psychiatry has been widely adopted and is considered to be a highly effective approach to treating mental health conditions, it has also been the subject of criticism.

The behavioral model of psychiatry is a valuable perspective on the role of learned behaviors and environmental factors in shaping mental health conditions.
