

Collector's Guide

to Antique Dolls

and Doll Marks

Paul H. Poppel

Introduction

The purpose of this book is to provide both experienced and novice collectors enough information to readily identify a doll, know its value, and have an easy-to-follow reference work for all occasions.

The best possible way to identify a doll is to have its description, an illustration, the doll mark which appears on it, and its relative value. With the doll mark you are also able to look for Marks-Cells dolls where the maker's name is just a part of the mark. In this book I have tried to list only dolls with the best eleven marks so that you can locate bargains which you can then hold or sell at very good markups. People who sell at flea markets and fairs, and especially antique auctions, do not have the time to research each item to determine its value. Selling prices are ordinarily only a markup over the cost to them. Incidentally, antique dealers are not experts in every type of item they carry. Once you are armed with the book's information, antique dealers' stocks are also worth exploring.

Locate a doll, look for its mark (usually found on the back of the head or neck), go to your car to find its value if the book covers it, and return to buy.

Selling the bargains you find is simple and painless. Call or write one of the auctioneers listed in the Acknowledgments. If you send the doll or dolls to them they will handle the complete bidding transaction and promptly pay you 80 percent of the price realized in competitive bidding.

The values shown in the book are discussed under "Price Information," but I do want to offer what I believe might be useful tips:

- Garage sales are no longer worth the time and labor involved in shopping and starting up again.
- Any flea market could have valuable dolls. Do not overlook the guys who spread beds or similar materials on the ground. When they have dolls or doll-related items they do not know values and were embarrassed to have them and even anxious to get rid of them so they can concentrate on what they know.
- Secondhand shops run by organizations usually have good
