Contrast effects have long been recognized as important for the study of judgement. It has been predicted that the presence of a categorization superimposed on a series of stimuli (and correlated with their magnitude) would serve to accentuate judged differences between and judged similarities within classes. Fifty-five subjects judged political statements, classified in terms of their authors. It was predicted that the contrast effects would be mediated by the salience of the categorization, the political views of the subjects, their affective ratings of authors and evaluations of political terms. Unlike numerous other studies with similar designs the results provided evidence for both the accentuation of inter-class differences and intra-class similarities. The relationships between judges' views and contrast were in accordance with accentuation theory and social identity theory, in that judges whose positions were congruent with the positive evaluations of the scale labels showed more contrast between classes. The results are discussed with reference to social identity theory and the role of category salience.

Judgements of the differences between groups of stimuli have long been of interest in psychophysics and in the study of stereotype formation. It has been proposed (for example, by Tajfel, 1969) that the accentuation of differences observed between groups of psychophysical stimuli is analogous to the perception of differences between social groups.

Tajfel (1959; Tajfel & Wilkes, 1963) argued that labels (e.g. the letters A and B) consistently applied to otherwise unclassified stimuli (e.g. lines differing in length from each other by only small amounts) would affect the judged magnitude of those stimuli when the labelling of the stimuli is correlated with the position of the stimuli on the judgement dimension. For example, when all of the larger stimuli are in one group (labelled 'B'), the labels become cues which observers use as information on which to base their judgements.

Paraphrasing Tajfel's hypotheses (which we will term the accentuation hypotheses), the presence of such a classifying label should accentuate:

1. the perceived differences between members of different classes (the inter-class effect); and
2. the perceived similarities between members of the same class (the intra-class effect).
