

The Rise of Militarism

Had Japan not been subject to new outside influences after 1929 it might have continued its earlier pattern of slow gains in a parliamentary direction within the framework of the constitution. It is possible, even, that the principle of automatically selecting the head of the majority party in the Diet as prime minister might have been established. But this trend came to an end. There was no reversion to the pre-1913 pattern of oligarchic control; nor were there revolutionary changes in the post-1890 structure of government. Rather, what happened was a small shift in the balance between the elites, the advantage passing from the parties to the military. This small shift produced an enormous change in political climate and policy, setting Japan upon the course that led to disaster in World War II. The three most important outside influences were: (the world depression that began in the United States in 1929), (the march north of the Kuomintang troops together with the emergence of a strong Chinese nationalism that threatened Japan's position in Manchuria), and (the rise to power of Hitler and Mussolini in Germany and Italy).

The Depression. In Japan the domestic depression of 1926 led to the bank crisis of 1927 in which a number of weak banks were wiped out. These developments took place against the economic backdrop of the relatively weak showing of the Japanese economy during the 1920's. These minor crises were followed by a major catastrophe when the world depression hit Japan early in 1930.

Objective indices show that the value of Japanese exports dropped 50 per cent from 1929 to 1931. Workers' real incomes dropped, from an index of 100 in 1926, to 81 in 1930, to 69 in 1931. Unemployment rose to about 3 million, with much of the burden falling on farm families. Rural Japan bore the brunt of the depression suffering; for example, between September 1929 and September 1930 the price of silk cocoons fell 65 per cent. In 1930 the "bumper crop famine" occurred. On October 2 a crop 12 per cent greater than that of the previous years was predicted; by the following day the price per unit (five bushels) of rice had fallen to sixteen yen, although the cost of production was seventeen yen. By October 10 the price had fallen to about ten yen. In 1931 the evil of too much was followed by the greater evil of too little. An unprecedented crop failure occurred in north-eastern Japan and Hokkaido. Images of the depression in Japan were formed by this event: children begging for food outside the dining-cars of trains, starving peasants stripping off the tender inner bark of pine trees or digging for the roots of wild plants, the agents for city brothels bargaining with farmers who had nothing left to sell but their daughters. Between 1926 and 1931, rural cash incomes fell from an index of 100 to 33, and
