

Visual Annotated Bibliography

Description: Your visual annotated bibliography will provide a showcase of the primary and secondary sources you'll employ in the major paper (the research-based argument).

Purpose/Goals: The purpose of this assignment is to give you practice distinguishing between descriptive and evaluative annotations, to introduce you to the major citation systems in use today, to develop your ability to discover, evaluate, and use the most important sources for your project. These critical evaluation skills will help you forge the most dynamic and rich research-based argument possible.

Subject/Procedure:

Step 1: The Research Log: Develop a research log in which you keep a running commentary/assessment of potential research sources for your project. Note: see Chapter 4 of Envision for more guidelines on the research log. You should hand in your research log as part of your final research paper portfolio. Realize that careful research notes are a crucial part of the process and they will help you avoid unintentional plagiarism ("kidnapping") of material. The log can be a combination of typed notes, highlighted photocopies, emails to yourself, a CD-ROM of sources from databases, notecards, and other means of processing all the information you encounter.

Step Two: Selections and Annotations: For the visual annotated bibliography, pull from your log your "greatest hits" and provide a written explanation of how your research is going. In other words, you will be writing up a selected list of your work in progress. You should identify your thesis, key points, obstacles, and successes so far.

Step Three: Presentation and Feedback: If you choose to present your visual annotated bibliography to the class, you'll get feedback from the class about your developing research paper.

Format/Length: You can separate primary and secondary sources if you wish, or arrange the entire list alphabetically. You should include images for your primary sources and annotations for the most crucial sources. Prepare the paper according to the manuscript format detailed in the guidelines on the pages below. Be sure that you provide a range of print and electronic sources, primary and secondary sources. Let us see your iceberg of research!
