LISA SMITH,¹

University of Cambridge

The event of a large-scale natural disaster offers a unique possibility to view the way in which the international community conceives of itself and its role in the “international” (Calhoun 2004). It also provides insight into assumptions that underpin global North-South relations—both on the part of the donors and on the part of the so-called beneficiaries. This article examines this encounter by foregrounding the aspects of humanitarian assistance which despite being the most tangible, are the least remarked upon in the policy and analysis of the global
