

A Statement of Accounting Principles

year, the AICPA established the Accounting Procedures Committee, which published a series of accounting research bulletins. The nature of these bulletins (and other accounting theory publications at the time) was summarised in the preface of Bulletin No. 43:

Forty-two bulletins were issued during the period 1939 to 1953. Eight of these were reports on terminology. The other 34 were the result of research by the committee on accounting procedures directed to those segments of accounting practice where problems were most demanding and with which business and the accounting profession were most concerned at the time.

As a result of this sporadic approach to the development of accounting principles, the AICPA established the Accounting Principles Board and appointed a director of accounting research in 1959. Overall, this period focused on the existing practical 'viewpoint' of accounting and, as research gained momentum over the period, the theories promulgated to explain practice became more detailed and complex.

Normative accounting

The period 1956–70 is labelled the 'normative period', because it was a period when accounting theorists attempted to establish 'norms' for 'best accounting practice'. During this period researchers, such as Edwards and Bell in 1961 and Chambers in 1966, were less concerned about what actually happened in practice and more concerned about developing theories that prescribed what should happen. In the years before 1956, several authors produced preliminary normative works which related mainly to issues surrounding the appropriate basis for the valuation of assets and owners' claims. These theories made adjustments for the impact of inflation and specific increases in asset prices.⁸

The normative period was one of significant debate. It degenerated into a battle between competing viewpoints on the ideal approach to measuring and reporting accounting information. During this period, the debate was predominantly about measurement rather than the actual practice of recording and reporting information. However, the end result was no clear choice for changing practice to one ideal system of (inflation or price adjusted) accounting, leading to the continued use of the historical cost method. The accounting profession in Australia has been reluctant to reignite the debate about recommending on a specific and ideal measurement system and has failed to issue comprehensive measurement guidelines. Instead, in 2005 the profession adopted the measurement guidelines contained in the International Accounting Standards Board's (IASB) conceptual framework. The IASB has rather an unstructured approach, with the accounting standards allowing adoption of current value measurement concepts to be mixed with historical cost.

Normative theories are distinguished because they adopt an objective (ideal) stance and then specify the means of achieving the stated objective. They provide prescriptions for what should occur to achieve their stated objective. As mentioned, the major focus of the normative accounting theories during the period 1956–70 was the impact of changing prices on the value of assets and the calculation of profit (such theories were often seen as a consequence of the record levels of inflation experienced during this period).⁹

Two groups dominated the normative period — the critics of historical cost accounting and the conceptual framework proponents. There was some overlap between these two groups, especially when historical cost critics tried to develop theories of accounting where asset measurement and profit determination depended on inflation and/or specific price movements.

During the normative period, the idea of a 'conceptual framework' gained increased popularity. A 'conceptual framework' is a structured theory of accounting. Such
