Abstract

The function of the teacher as a mediator in the curriculum's transmission is becoming more important. Future generations must be taught from gender-equitable viewpoints, global perspectives that cultivate values for peace, respect the rights of all, and perspectives that appreciate and value labour if they are to promote equitable and sustainable development for all parts of society and respect for all. Educating teachers is a worldwide profession with specific cultural nuances that need to be addressed. To succeed in this field, it is crucial to understand the profession as a whole, to speculate about its near-term future, and to use the most cutting-edge theoretical frameworks and pedagogical practises. In today's world, where human progress and evolution are propelled by a wave of innovative initiatives, the need for effective educators is great and growing. It is because of these changes and improvements that 21st century educational standards will be superior to those of the previous century. Therefore, in order to thrive in the classrooms of the twenty-first century, educators will need a broader set of generalized and discipline-specific knowledge and abilities.

Introduction

The former president of India, Dr. A.P.J. Abdul Kalam says "the whole purpose of Education in a country is to develop and enhance the potential of human research and progressively transform it into a knowledge Society". The UNESCO International Commission on education for 21st Century has identified four pillars of learning such as learning to know, learning to do, learning to be, learning to live together. To fulfil this purpose of education, teacher has a very significant role. (Soundararajan M., et al., 2022) India's long-standing culture of education has weathered difficult times without losing its core strength. Intensive work to improve and expand teacher training began in the years after independence. Significant efforts have been undertaken to adapt and update the teacher education curriculum to local demands so that it better meets the unique requirements of India. (Saravankumar AR., 2014) The function of the teacher as a mediator in the curriculum's transmission is becoming more important. Future generations must be taught from gender-equitable viewpoints, perspectives that cultivate values for peace, respect the rights of all, and perspectives that appreciate and value labour if they are to promote equitable and sustainable development for all parts of society and respect for all. (Subbiah S., et al., 2012) Teachers are being trained to recognise whether the use of technology is beneficial or harmful to students' growth and development. Educating teachers is a worldwide profession with specific cultural nuances that need to be addressed. (Jazeel A.M., & Saravankumar AR., 2016) To succeed in this field, it is crucial to understand the profession as a whole, to speculate about its near-term future, and to use the most cutting-edge theoretical frameworks and pedagogical practises. In today's world, where human progress and evolution are propelled by a wave of innovative initiatives, the need for effective educators is great and growing. It is because of these changes and improvements that 21st century educational standards will be superior to those of the previous century. Therefore, in order to thrive in the classrooms of the twenty-first century, educators will need a broader set of generalized and discipline-specific knowledge and abilities. (Jazeel A.M., & Saravankumar AR., 2015). The curriculum should reflect the dynamic nature of society's demands, the realities of globalisation, the rapid development and spread of technology. A change in the learner's nature and, consequently, in the learning process, also results in a change in the teacher's nature for the twenty-first century. (Kalaiselvi R., et al., 2012) In the classroom contact cycle, the teacher is crucial. Additionally, when the general learning environment develops, changes in the nature and function of a teacher are inevitable. One of the earliest and most prestigious occupations, teaching has gained international recognition and recognition. Teachers have always been necessary, but their jobs, responsibilities, and even educational requirements have changed dramatically throughout the years. Because of historical shifts and societal demands, traditional methods of training educators have had to evolve.

Changing Context of Teacher Education in India

India's long-standing culture of education has weathered difficult times without losing its core strength. Intensive work to improve and expand teacher training began in the years after independence. With the rise of Education programs and the need to make primary school available to everyone, the system of training new teachers has been put under significant strain. When India gained its independence from Britain in 1946, it inherited a foreign model of teacher preparation. Since then, however, significant efforts have been undertaken to adapt and update the teacher education curriculum to local demands so that it better meets the unique requirements of India. (Saravankumar AR., & Padmini Devi K.R., 2020) "To improve the quality and efficacy of pre-service and in-service programmes for serving teachers throughout the country, the existing system of teacher education is supported by a network of national, province, and district level resource institutions working together".
