Editorial on the Research Topic

Advances on upper-atmosphere characterization for geodetic space weather research and applications.

Predictive space weather modeling is a burgeoning field that aims to expand our knowledge of how space weather impacts our environment and how we can better anticipate and prepare for its effects. Scientists use a variety of sources, including information gathered by satellites and ground-based instruments, to better understand the behavior of solar wind, solar radiation, and cosmic rays, and how these phenomena interact with near-Earth space. These data are then used to model and predict space weather patterns that help decisions and actions to reduce risks and ensure safety. There are numerous areas where data on space weather plays a critical role in decision-making. These include aviation and spaceflight, military operations, emergency management and natural disasters preparedness, health and safety, environmental protection, global transportation, energy production and distribution, and more. By leveraging geodetic data from ground-based and Earth-orbiting satellites, as well as other types of instrumentation, scientists and decision-makers can monitor and predict the effects of space weather events to inform practical applications.

On 22 April 2017, the Focus Area on Geodetic Space Weather Research (FA-GSWR) was established in Vienna within the Global Geodetic Observing System (GGOS) of the International Association of Geodesy (IAG). Figure 1 provides a visual representation of the FA-GSWR organizational structure, illustrating the space-geodetic observation techniques in orange and the solar observations in blue. To address the challenges associated with the coupled magnetosphere-ionosphere-thermosphere (MIT) system, significant progress must be made in geodetic observations of plasma and neutral density, compositions, and velocities, as well as observations of energetic particles and magnetic field perturbations both in space and on the ground. Moreover, advanced theoretical and numerical modeling capabilities are necessary to support these
