Lewis,2026-03-12 The problem of evil is among the most significant philosophical arguments posed against the existence of God Crucial to this argument is the premise that God on account of his divine moral perfection is necessarily constrained to prevent or mitigate evil whenever it is possible for him to do so Natural Theology and the Problem of Evil offers a unique resolution to this challenge by focusing first on the necessary truths of God s existence and nature via a systematic natural theology By starting with these first principles the theist is left with a confidence in God s existence and nature as omniscient omnipotent and perfectly good sufficient to overcome the problem of evil The theistic foundations that emerge result in a denial of any moral obligation that God might have to intervene in a well ordered creation Thus God on account of his nature and attributes as well as the nature of evil and the natural operation of the world is under no moral constraint to always prevent evil in the manner required by the evidential argument and thus proposed instances of gratuitous evil are necessarily compatible with the existence of God
