Abstract. This paper explains how and why the developed countries are undergoing a fundamental shift away from a managed economy and towards an entrepreneurial economy. This shift is shaping the development of western capitalism and has triggered a shift in government policies away from constraining the freedom of business to contract through regulation, public ownership and antitrust towards a new set of enabling policies which foster the creation and commercialization of new knowledge. The empirical evidence from a cross-section of countries over time suggests that those countries that have experienced a greater shift from the managed to the entrepreneurial economy have had lower levels of unemployment.

Key words: Entrepreneurship – Knowledge – Growth – Schumpeter – Unemployment

JEL-classification: O0

* This paper is the result of a series of visits by David Audretsch as a Visiting Research Fellow at the Tinbergen Institute and as a Research Fellow at EIM in 1997 and 1998.
