The Dealings of Captain Sharkey Arthur Conan Doyle,2016-12-15 Sharkey the abominable Sharkey was out again After two years of the Coromandel coast his black barque of death the Happy Delivery was prowling off the Spanish Main while trader and fisher flew for dear life at the menace of that patched fore topsail rising slowly over the violet rim of the tropical sea As the birds cower when the shadow of the hawk falls athwart the field or as the jungle folk crouch and shiver when the coughing cry of the tiger is heard in the night time so through all the busy world of ships from the whalers of Nantucket to the tobacco ships of Charleston and from the Spanish supply ships of Cadiz to the sugar merchants of the Main there spread the rumour of the black curse of the ocean Some hugged the shore ready to make for the nearest port while others struck far out beyond the known lines of commerce but none were so stout hearted that they did not breathe more freely when their passengers and cargoes were safe under the guns of some mothering fort Through all the islands there ran tales of charred derelicts at sea of sudden glares seen afar in the night time and of withered bodies stretched upon the sand of waterless Bahama Keys All the old signs were there to show that Sharkey was at his bloody game once more These fair waters and yellow rimmed palm nodding islands are the traditional home of the sea rover First it was the gentleman adventurer the man of family and honour who fought as a patriot though he was ready to take his payment in Spanish plunder Then within a century his debonair figure had passed to make room for the buccaneers robbers pure and simple yet with some organised code of their own commanded by notable chieftains and taking in hand great concerted enterprises They too passed with their fleets and their sacking of cities to make room for the worst of all the lonely outcast pirate the bloody Ishmael of the seas at war with the whole human race This was the vile brood which the early eighteenth century had spawned forth and of them all there was none who could compare in audacity wickedness and evil repute with the unutterable Sharkey
