eyes with delightful expectations and thrills along their backs and with little squeakings and gurglings like so many little white mice and if Santa Claus had not always been so very prompt in disappearing up the chimney before daybreak he must certainly have been caught For by the time the chickens were crowing in the morning there would be an answering twitter through the house and with a patter of little feet and subdued laughter small white clad figures would steal through the dim light of dusky rooms and cold passages opening doors with sudden bursts and shouting Christmas gift into darkened chambers at still sleeping elders Then they would scurry away in the gray light to rake open the hickory embers and revel in the exploration of their bulging overcrowded stockings
