Abstract

Objectives. Serious illness conversations (SICs) can improve the experience and well-being of patients with advanced cancer. A structured Serious Illness Conversation Guide (SICG) has been shown to improve oncology patient outcomes but was developed and tested in a predominantly White population. To help address disparities in advanced cancer care, we aimed to assess the acceptability of the SICG among African Americans with advanced cancer and their clinicians.

Methods. A two-phase study conducted in Charleston, SC, included focus groups to gather perspectives on the SICG in Black Americans and a single-arm pilot study of a revised SICG with surveys and qualitative exit interviews to evaluate patient and clinician perspectives. We used descriptive analysis of survey results and thematic analysis of qualitative data.

Results. Community-based and patient focus group participants ( $N = 20$ ) reported that a simulated conversation using an adapted SICG built connection, promoted control, and fostered consideration of religious faith and family. Black patients with advanced cancer ( $N = 23$ ) reported that SICG-guided conversations were acceptable, helpful, and promoted conversations with loved ones. Oncologists found conversations feasible to implement and skill-building, and also identified opportunities for training and implementation that could support meeting the needs of their patients with low health literacy. An adapted SICG includes language to assess the strength and affirm the clinician-patient relationship.

Significance of results. An adapted structured communication tool to facilitate SIC, the SICG, appears acceptable to Black Americans with advanced cancer and seems feasible for use by oncology clinicians working with this population. Further testing in other marginalized populations may address disparities in advanced cancer care.

Introduction

A growing body of evidence suggests that conversations about prognosis, goals, and values can improve the experience and well-being of patients with advanced cancer. These “serious illness conversations” (SICs) appear to improve rates of moderate to severe anxiety and depression, for example, an effect that may be mediated by improved information sharing and relationships with clinicians (Kumar et al. 2020; Paladino et al. 2019). Like other advance care planning (ACP) interventions, SIC may increase utilization of hospice and decrease hospitalization and intensive care utilization at the end of life (Ahluwalia et al. 2015; Brinkman-Stoppelenburg et al. 2014) ultimately improving quality “end-of-life” care (Teno et al. 2004, 2007, 2005).

Black Americans experience lower quality communication in health-care settings generally (Bullock 2006; Palmer et al. 2014; Shen et al. 2018) participate less in ACP (Harrison et al. 2016), advance directives (Bazargan et al. 2021), and enroll in hospice at lower rates than White Americans (Loggers et al. 2009; Mack et al. 2010a). Multiple factors contribute to lower engagement of Black Americans in ACP: patient factors include cultural and religious beliefs that may shape willingness to talk about dying, family consensus (as opposed to individual) decision-making, and poor access to care; clinician factors include implicit and explicit racial biases about willingness to participate in such discussions and challenges with cross-cultural communication (Periyakoll et al. 2013; Sanders et al. 2016). Varied interventions
