

Architecture Diagram

What is Architecture Diagram

An architecture is a collection of system components and their relationships. Architecture can be simply defined as a conceptual business architecture, application architecture, data architecture, and technical architecture.

- Business architecture (BA) is a methodology to determine the boundaries of the business, including the product groups. It is the plan or form the business.
- Application architecture (AA) is the overall architecture of the whole system implementation. It needs to capture the look of the system, the principles of system development, and the application services at each level of the system.
- Data architecture (DA) is a set of architectural for defining data, which defines data according to system application domains and type of different data groups. For instance, all data independently, separately, relating, linked, shared, and distributed data clusters. The main goal of DA is to create a data architecture.
- Technical architecture (TA) is a methodology and tool to solve problems with which application and systems are created to solve the needs of the customer. However, not all data or technologies you need to add throughout the build process. The technical professional should realize the design requirements of the architectural architecture, and carry out the technical details according to the technical details requirements. It describes the relationships between both new technology and current technology ready.

How to Draw an Architecture Diagram

- Figure out what level of architecture diagram to draw.
- Identify key elements in the architecture diagram and, possibly, sub-diagrams, services.
- Set out the relationships between key elements (business, system, service, etc).
- Finalize an architecture diagram with clear descriptions.
