

Types of adverse drug reactions (ADRs)

Types of ADRs

Traditional ADRs

Extended ADRs

Type A

Type A, which are associated with low mortality and high morbidity.

Type A ADRs, sometimes called augmented reactions, result from the drug's known pharmacological properties. They are often an exaggeration of the drug's effect when given at standard therapeutic doses, such as respiratory depression with opioids or bleeding with warfarin.<sup>3</sup>

Type B

Type B, which are associated with low morbidity but high mortality.<sup>5</sup>

"Bizarre", or Type B reactions, are responses that cannot be predicted given the pharmacology of the drug, such as anaphylaxis with penicillin or the severe skin reaction, Stevens-Johnson syndrome, with antiepileptics. Type B reactions are less common than Type A reactions, and are often only discovered after a drug has been approved for use.<sup>3</sup>

Type C

Some ADRs, such as osteonecrosis of the jaw with bisphosphonates, can persist in the long-term, for example, and these are categorised as Type C or 'chronic' reactions.

Type D

The term Type D reactions describes ADRs that only become apparent after the patient has used the medicine for some time i.e. delayed. Leucopenia, or low white blood cells, can develop six weeks after a dose of lomustine, and is an example of a Type D ADR.

Type E

Type E, or 'end of use' reactions, are those associated with the withdrawal of a medicine. An example of this is symptoms such as insomnia, anxiety and perceptual disturbances after stopping benzodiazepines.<sup>3</sup>
