FINE PRINT

A LETTER FOR THE ARTS OF THE BOOK

Harry Duncan & The Cummington Press

Mary L. Richmond

HARRY DUNCAN has the distinction of being the designer, printer, and publisher of remarkably beautiful hand-printed first editions of the work of more than a dozen pre-eminent American poets of the twentieth century. Among them are Wallace Stevens, Allen Tate, Robert Lowell, William Carlos Williams, R. F. Blakmur, Marianne Moore, Yvor Winters, and the poet of the American theatre, Tennessee Williams. As a publisher, he has done only original work, usually poetry. Because he is himself a poet of consequence, Duncan was able to choose perceptively from among the best poets of the latter half of this century. These poets recognized Duncan's dedication and talent and demonstrated their confidence by entrusting to him their manuscripts for printing. His poetic talent also enabled him to print poetry with a preciseness of meaning recognized by Wallace Stevens when he wrote, "There appears nothing to change in the proofs of the poem . . . certainly it says exactly what I have intended to say."

... That total artifice reveals itself
As the total reality.

Harry Duncan's mastery of fine printing is inextricably interwoven with The Cummington School of the Arts and his twelve-year association with Paul Wightman Williams. The Cummington Press had a most inauspicious beginning at The Cummington School, a small but distinguished summer center for creativity in the rural village of Cummington, Massachusetts. A group of young enthusiasts, totally unaware of the demands of hand printing, audaciously voted in 1925 to expend the whole of the school's acquisition fund on a handpress. They were encouraged in this venture by a remarkable woman, Kathryn Frazier, founder and, until her death in 1944, vigorous director of the school. She harnessed their enthusiasm and participated in the editorial and printing activities of the press. Miss Frazier insisted upon value for money spent and consulted only the most distinguished authorities—Carl Rollins, Ward Ritchie, Dard Hunter, Will Ransom, and, finally, Frederic Goudy who was called to inspect the aged Taylor press which was to be acquired. It was necessary to call upon a local cabinet maker and welder to replace missing parts; the result was a skin-tight fit of the inner tympan, causing it to rub the sides of the platen, and a steel frisket that weighed ten pounds. These handicaps were not corrected until many years later, but a shaky frame of soft wood was replaced by one of oak. Necessary accessories were acquired and a font of Centaur type laid in the cases. Harry Duncan began to "play with the types" and finally chose to print, as the first item from the press, the first two sentences from An Typographic:

Simplicity is the last thing learned. It comes from simple thinking not from a conscious attempt to be simple.

The stringent demands of hand printing eventually discouraged the rest of the group, but Harry Duncan and Kathryn Frazier had been captivated by hand printing as a way of life; it was a captivity that was to keep Duncan entranced for nearly forty years. The imprint of The Cummington Press was first used in 1927 in Scenes on the Red Colombe, a collection of whaler's letters. A mastery of stubborn problems and materials is evident in this book; dampened paper was used and other refinements were introduced. The type area and the margins show a nice proportion and the impressions begin to look professional.

The school was closed after Pearl Harbor, and Miss Frazier's incurable illness prevented her further participation in printing. Harry Duncan, who had been rejected for military service, departed to serve a very short but valuable apprenticeship with Edmund B. Thompson of Hawthorne House in Windham, Connecticut. Upon returning to the Cummington School, Duncan was made manager of the press. About this time, Gustav Wolf, a painter and wood engraver from a neighboring German refugee camp, joined him. Wolf was to assist with the presswork and provide the illustrations. They worked on the Book of Job, a book undertaken as an act of piety and as an implicit memorial to Kathryn Frazier. Although it was produced in the school's unheated dining hall,
