INTRODUCTION

Medicine is intertwined with promotion of positive health while prioritizing a patient's diagnosis, prognosis, and treatment. The prioritization of a patient's needs stems from a branch of morality called biomedical ethics, which focuses on moral principles that arise in healthcare, medical research.¹ Biomedical ethics serves to provide a framework for addressing complex medical questions while safeguarding the rights, dignity, and well-being of individuals.² Often times in healthcare, decisions made by physicians and patients result in beneficence and/or maleficence. Beneficence implies that healthcare professionals and institutions have a moral duty to act in a patient's best interest by providing positive health outcomes while minimizing harm (maleficence).³ As a result of biomedical ethics' emphasis on beneficence and maleficence, healthcare is designed to respect a patient's needs, beliefs, and decisions. The practice of allowing patients to make their own medical decisions is called autonomy, and it is vital to biomedical ethics because it emphasizes the concerns of the patient.⁴ However, it is difficult to ensure that a person has autonomy over their medical decision-making if they are not fully informed about the circumstances of their health or treatment options.

ANALYSIS

Thus, an important aspect of biomedical ethics is informed consent. Furthermore, there is an important distinction to be made between voluntary consent and informed consent. While informed consent emphasizes that individuals are fully educated and comprehend information about a procedure, voluntary consent maintains that a person must freely and willingly make decisions without any form of pressure or coercion.⁶ While a patient might be educated or informed about their health, they might not have the power to voluntarily make medical choices. Thus, consent must be both informed and voluntary to ensure that a patient is fully educated while preserving the right to make medical decisions. Without autonomy and (voluntary) informed consent, individuals would be deprived of their freedom to make educated medical choices, leading to interventions that do not align with their wishes or desires. However, autonomy and
