

Childhood Development Case Study

Topic: Psychology | Words: 1915 | Pages: 7

Introduction

In 1993, Davis described a case study as a story that signifies real, contextualized, and multifaceted circumstances that comprise dilemmas, conflicts, or problems without clear solutions. Child development theory refers to a fact-based ideas that clearly explain how children grow and change in the childhood stage (Dunn, 2020). The theories focus on numerous parts of development including social, emotional, and cognitive growth. This case study article will base arguments on two main development theories in Siyasanda's childhood growth: social learning and attachment theories.

Social Learning Development Theory

Theories provide an outline through which a person understands aspects of the development procedure, and how people change as well as grow in childhood. Social-emotional growth comprises the experience, expression, and organization of the child's feelings and the capability to create positive and pleasing relations with other children (Jeong, et al. 2021). Siyasanda is an academically average student stressed to choose which career to follow because the girl cannot pursue tertiary education. The girl is a member of a communal connected group in the school but never attends any of the social functions. When Siyasanda joined high school, the kid concentrated much on academics because the girl knew that the mother could not help with school homework. This made Siyasanda struggle in making new friends at school because the girl spent very little time socializing with schoolmates. The girl finds
