

Four Examples of Tambour Work on Muslin, 1770-1800

Ganthorpe Hall, Lancashire, UK

1 This large fragment of fine muslin has a surrounding vine design with large flower heads. The thread is cotton and the colours are so bright and fresh it could have been worked yesterday. The centres of the flowers are worked with a single pulled fabric stitch in very fine white cotton thread. The design is clearly drawn so that the tambour work is economical and the working time is the lowest possible with all needles.

Georgia, Duchess of Devonshire, 1784
I went to the court in one of the muslin gowns with five lace that the Queen of France gave me. In the evening I went to the ball. I had an English night gown of muslin with small silver spots and all white.

1 Below and right: A surrounding vine design and large flower heads within the muslin fragment

2 This piece of muslin is dyed with tiny snatches, only 1/16 (1.2cm) square, worked in fine silk thread. Alternating with the snatches are small spots that are worked in horizontal silver plate, which suggests that this piece may have Indian origins. Attached to one end of the piece is a band of fabric with two 1/16 (2cm) horizontal tabs. This band implies that the fragment was part of a gown.

3 This fragment is on the finest gauze-like muslin and worked with a highly twisted silk thread. The use of a fine white thread is interesting. Note the continuous pattern the tambour work makes to complete the design.
